(Lillian, Henry, Lisa, and Matt are in a job interview)

Ms. Cheng: Good morning, everyone. I'm Ms.

Cheng, the president's secretary, hosting the job interview today. Now, I would like to ask you some questions. The first one is: What was your previous job?

Lillian: I was a secretary before. My job was to do office work like making phone calls for my boss.

Henry: I was a salesman before. I sold good books and nice things to people.

Lisa: I don't have lots of working experience. But I know a lot about law and help people to know about their rights.

Matt: I was a reporter. I delivered news to people on TV, so they could know what happened in the world.

Ms. Cheng: All of you are good. But we want someone who can answer the phone and know how to respond reporters' questions. Can you handle this?

Lillian: Yes, I can. This is what I usually do.

Henry: No. But I can learn.

Lisa: I don't have the experience, either. However, I trust I can do it well.

Matt: I have good a relationship with some reporters. I believe I am the best candidate.

Ms. Cheng: OK! Thanks for your response. Lillian. and Matt, please stay here. I would like to talk more to you.

Different cultures have their own superstitions. In Taiwan, many technological companies would buy Kuai Kuai with the green pack to help things work. They do this by putting Kuai Kuai on top of machines. Moreover, pineapples meaning "business is good" should not appear in hospitals. Doctors and nurses wouldn't like to see many patients.

In the UK, garlic is used to keep the vampires away and people throw rice at weddings for good luck. Besides, salt can keep ghosts away. However, if you drop salt on the table in the UK, it means bad luck and people need to throw it over their shoulders.

No matter you believe it or not, it's very important to respect every culture. There must be some backgrounds or stories in each superstition.
